

Dear Mr. President,

I've been in this game long enough to know that there is nothing glamorous about how the sausage is made. The image is often prestigious but the job is mostly hard work to build relationships, do your homework, and never underestimate the power of small nuances. If you had any experience you would appreciate those things. Even worse is that you don't even respect your own shortcomings. There three kinds of leaders: The type who are experts in the field they are in, the type who don't know the field and are wise enough to build a great team of people who are experts, and those who are failures. You are the last of those three. It's so sad that being desperately afraid of looking like a failure makes you actually become a failure. Not sad for you. Sad for the country.

Sincerely,

A member of your staff
